Give me back my small tedious dreams they are all to me such as they are.

I'm stitting around after school with a friend of mine when this kid comes over and yells at us. He doesn't belong at school: numero uno, he's speaking Spanish, and secondly, he's eight. He's yelling and screaming and running around imitating a green jeep and announcing, hay diablos aqui! He is really determined to put the whole act together and make us understand. But we don't get it. So just to make the kid feel good we agree with him, giving him a rousing chorus of right ons and real greats and take it easys. Then he leaves, of course not by his own choice. Two NTW girls come and shuffle him off like some old geezer in a bar that drank too much and was annoying the women. And they tell us what he's saying, and what we were agreeing with. How are we supposed to know the kid is telling us there are devils in the school?

There's something about clouds or the absence of them that really makes me wonder.

When everybody is driving to school in the morning they think once or twice about steamrolling that guy who directs traffic on Happ. He's just another one of those morning reminders that we can't be late to the party. (The invitation doesn't say eightish, it says 8:15.) Everybody is always picturing him on their bumpers and he knows it. I don't think he's quite so worried in the afternoon because he figures the kids are happy to be getting out of school and into the malt shops. But how he remains so relatively calm in the face of death every morning is beyond me.

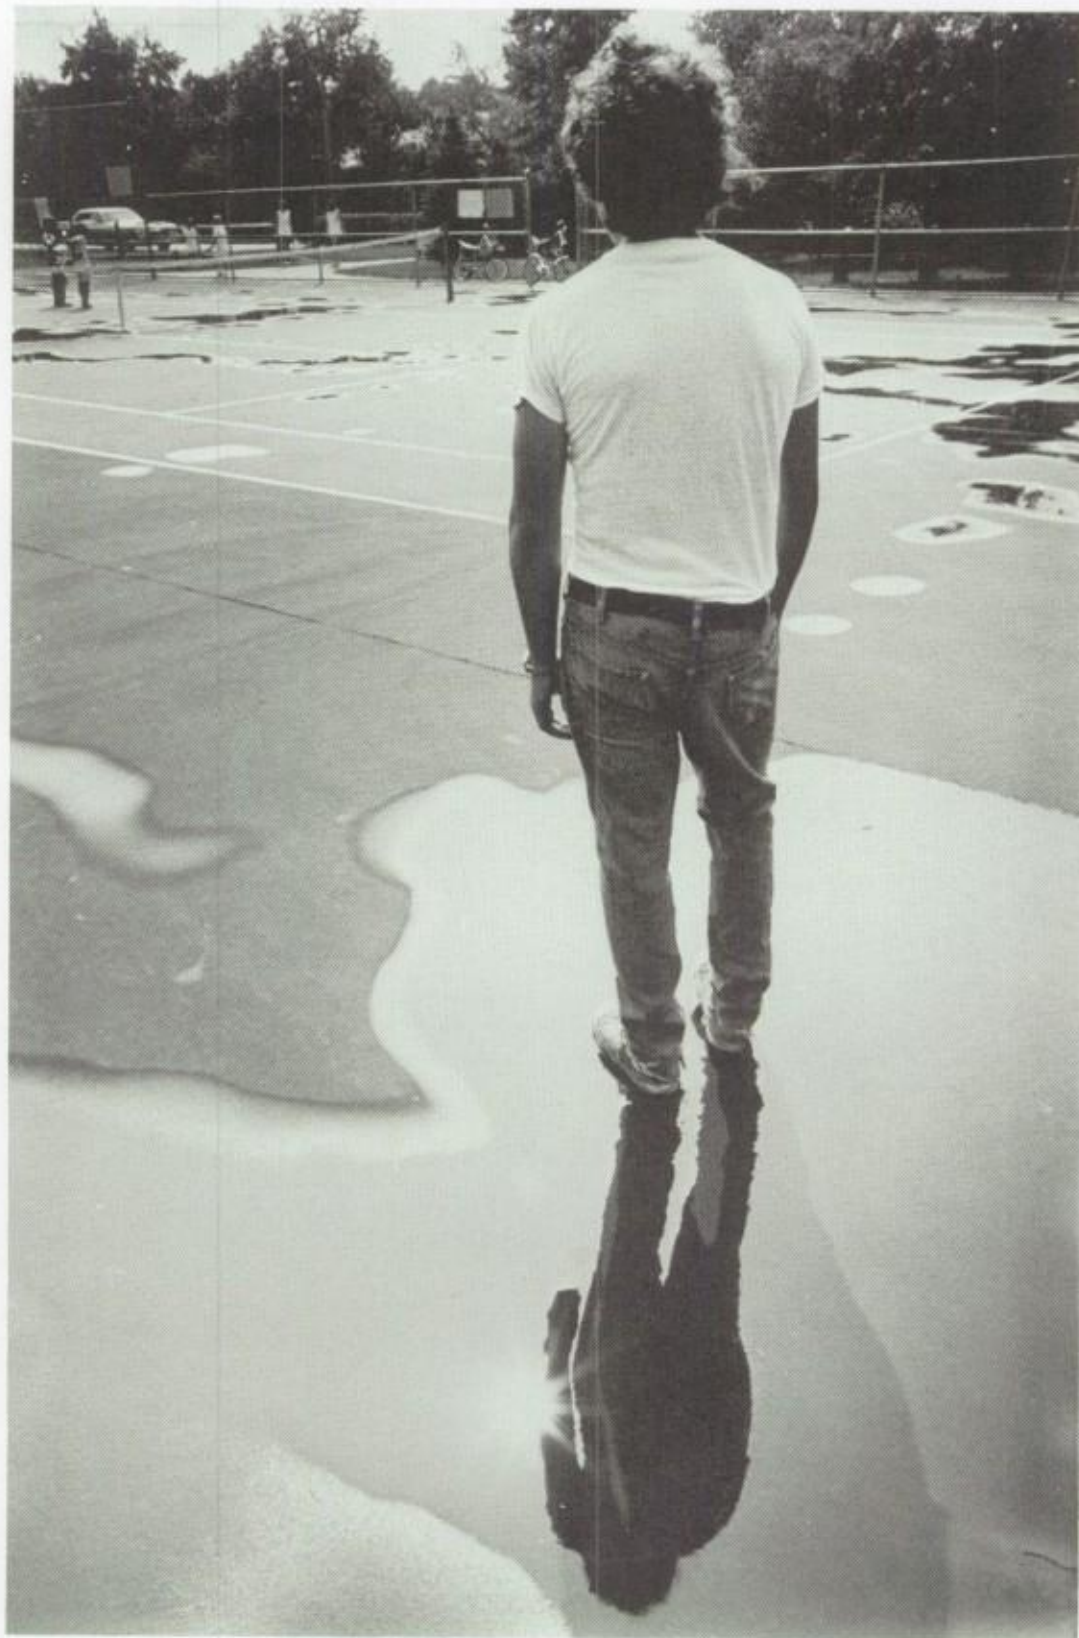

He is probably picturing himself as some bullfighter, gracefully caping Chevies and Datsuns and Cadillacs as if there were just people driving them instead of dangerous wild animals.

He is manipulating cars in a parking lot that is also a mobile home arena and moveable furniture showroom. He is delivering mobs unto the hallways where hundreds, maybe thousands, of students cram in three directions through one double door without thinking of opening the other. He is working in a school where people leave food on the cafeteria tables but are careful to throw out the knives and trays and forks. He is the symbol of New Trier West. He is crazy.

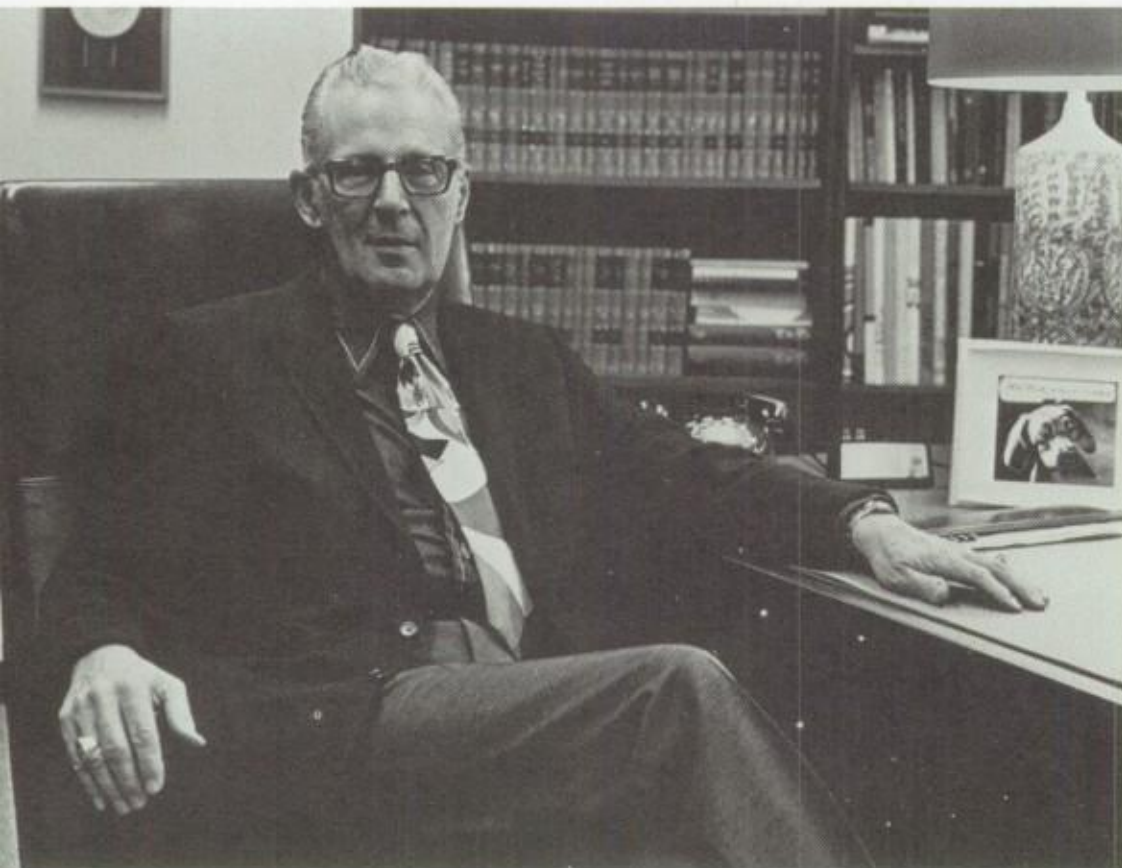

Dr. William H. Cornog

"To really know Bill Cornog, you must read what he has written. He is above everything else a scholar, a teacher, a philosopher, and that is why he and New Trier have been at the leading edge of American education all these years." Thus, in recognition of Dr. Cornog's leadership during the nineteen years he has served as superintendent and of his retirement this year, it seems most appropriate to present some selections from his speeches and writings over the years . . .

1950

. . . if life is to be a moral and spiritual adventure and if living is to include the fine art of being a human being, we had better find some stars to steer by and some humane values to live by.

The democratic faith rests upon the postulation of primary, fundamental equality and assumes: (a) that all men are equally capable of and equally responsible for participating in the complex process of self-government; and (b) that public education — all education — will uphold that faith by imparting a common fund of knowledge and precept, a common sense of political obligation, and a common ability in intelligent judgment and election.

The democratic faith further holds that every man has the indisputable right to develop as an individual to the limit of his capacity and aspiration and is, therefore, entitled to an education which will enable him to live as richly in mind and spirit as his natural endowment will allow him to live.

Therefore, education in a democracy has the twofold objective of training a man to such social and political competency as will enable him to preserve life and liberty and to such philosophic balance and flexibility of mind as will serve him well in his pursuit of happiness.

Those who exalt conformity and seek to produce the well-adjusted child and, I take, the readily employable man have forgotten that progress most frequently comes by way of people who have the greatest reluctance to adjust and who have the least concern with security of employment.

The only way a child can relate his present doings to his future is by an act of imagination, by the abstraction of the principle of the action, because only the principle of the action can endure through the manifold vicissitudes of life.

I believe that the design of the education of our youth must begin with these assumptions: that the good life in a free society is a life of continuous and rigorous challenge; that it takes staying power, intellectual and moral stamina, to face that challenge; that the source of such stamina is a knowledge of the nature of reality or truth and of the the nature of man; that the assault upon such knowledge, the conquest of the mountain, can be undertaken by men of good will and good intelligence; and finally, that the climb must be attempted simply because the mountain is there.

It is peculiarly our job in the public schools to describe and define the traditions of civility without which our nation can have neither community nor integrity, nor purpose in existing. And having described the traditions of civility it is then our job to seek to transmit them to our children. No school in the country, certainly no public school, has a greater opportunity to do this than New Trier Township High School. No school may more confidently anticipate seeing its philosophy and its teaching become effective in the lives of youth, in the community, and ultimately, in the nation. The potential for leadership here, for the production of what Lippman calls "men of light and leading," is, I believe, unparalleled. If any school can help renew the public philosophy, this school should be able to do it.

Only two men stood on the summit of Mt. Everest, but man had conquered the mountain. The conquest by Hillary and Tenzing was a triumph of the spirit of man, and we all share in it. We all share, also, in the exaltation of that spirit in a symphony of Beethoven's, a painting of Michelangelo's a great play or poem, an equation by Einstein, or the deeds of a thousand forgotten heroes, or other witnesses to man's capacity to endure, to create, and to comprehend the wonder and the beauty of the world. It is in teaching men the means of maturing to such a sense of indentification with the world of man that I believe education may find its true design.

The schools are not in business to teach anything to anyone or everything to everyone. They are not to be confused, although sometimes they may be by their architecture, with shopping centers. We do not, I hope, put signs in our school corridors: "What you don't see, ask for." If we have them up, I hope we take down the signs which say "The customer is always right."

There are few consequences of an undisciplined education more pathetic than the educated or at least diplomaed man whose conversation on political or social matters crackles with cliches, stereotypes and slogans, like the shelling of dry pods of dead ideas. You cannot turn out a thinker with any less effort than one turns out a musician or an artist, or even an athlete. The discipline of hard and patient effort is inescapable.

The dilemma of teaching, as Whitehead points out, is the necessity of encouraging both initiative and training, and training or a rigorous attention to the needful things to know is apt to kill initiative. I think every teacher has had to face this dilemma. He knows that he must inculcate the habit of inquiry at the same time that he is attempting to generate spontaneity. He knows that he must stand for ordered knowledge and yet not fence in with barbed logic the antic imagination. He must restrain and discipline the mind and at the same time attempt to enlarge and liberate the mind. He must make a careful balance in his teaching between those things which demand conformity on the part of the student and much restraint and discipline of study, and those things which may develop the student's capacities for creativity, for aesthetic appreciation, and independence of view.

The freest man I know has the freest mind because his profound learning has made freedom and discipline indistinguishable to him in his way of life. And he has won his freedom not as a last gasp on a serene peak, but through the exciting rigors of the climb. To him the way of discipline is the way of freedom, and his life, like those of scholars and wise men like him, is a witness to the illimitable humanity of man. This is a freedom which cannot be hawked in the streets or advertised or conferred or bought and sold. Yet it is the only freedom which is worth a man's seeking or a school's teaching, because it is the only freedom which cannot be diminished, corrupted, or destroyed by either blandishment or terror.

Last Sunday, October 4, was the second anniversary of Sputnik I, a shot that blew a good many educators out of their seats, and some of them down on their knees before some Russian-style laboratory icons. It was the quickest genuflection science had ever received, and some people haven't risen yet. But Sputnik had some other good effects, because in making science venerable, it made learning at least respectable. This was gratifying to those of us who had been teaching and running our schools on this basis all our lives. It began to look as though the herd was swinging around to follow the mavericks, even though our upland pastures looked a little rocky and sparse from the feed-lots and sunny meadows of the cow-centered, or the bull-centered curriculum.

It is the task of our schools to aid the restoration of man, the ending of man's estrangement from himself. My argument is that for more than a century, by reason of the apotheosis of Science and the coronation of Progress, man has lost his way and is in flight from his humanity. My thesis is that poetry is more important to our salvation than rocketry; that the person is more important than the People; that we have smashed the wrong idols and worshipped the wrong gods. I hold that the way back to true reverence, manhood, and meaning is through the arts, philosophy, religion, and poetry — all of which were at one time central to our schools and our teaching. I shall speak on behalf of not the child-centered or the community-centered, but the man-centered school.

The harried defenders of humanism and apologists for the arts have in present controversies advanced many good reasons for the study of the humanities. The reasons are really quite simple. First, man has never quite been able to escape himself, try as he may by dodging into crowds, immersing himself in mass emotions, performing en masse social and religious rituals, enjoying public entertainments, rushing about getting and spending. Self-consciousness remains his peculiar heritage and he is fated to have the capacity to regard himself and to know that he is alone. His loneliness, his selfness, keeps crowding in, and the questions come and keep coming: Who am I? Why am I here? Where did I come from? Where am I going? Only man asks these questions. And each man has to find the answers — some kind of answers, for the questioning is insistent. Unless he finds the answers for himself, he rings hollow not to the world alone but to himself also. He must discover the law for man, or as much of it as will make life reverberate with some few decibels of meaning.

"All things excellent," said Spinoza, "are as difficult as they are rare." The trouble with American education for many years has been that it hasn't known Spinoza from ravioli in either the literal or figurative sense. I think it will take some further education of educators to make it clear, in the operation of our American schools, that Spinoza and ravioli are quite different things, and by no means equally worthy of the attention of teachers and scholars.

If the end of man on earth were happiness, conceived to be on a level as close to his animal nature as he still is, civilized man would undoubtedly, given the choice, place cooks above philosophers and ravioli before Spinoza. If one could measure reliably the gross joy of mankind produced by vineyards against the gross joy produced by libraries at any given moment, the victory would be forever with the grape. The drives by which we live are for the most part shared with our fellow animals. It is only man's handmade reason, his curious talent for thinking, for remembering, and for being conscious of himself which makes him a man. Becoming a man has greatly complicated his life. Given greater individuality than the animals by his much more random genetic development, he is never the less somehow impelled to live in societies, and must curb his native selfness and selfishness to do so. By nature, by his incredible variety within the species, he is a loner, but he finds through centuries of habit and the benefits of recorded experience, that he is also a sharer. The longer he has lived and shared life the more dependent and interdependent he has become, the more complex his relationships, the more remote the possibility of the casual and immediate satisfaction of his wants, the more sublimated his drives, the more idealized and intellectualized his goals, the more knowledgeable his intellect, the more disciplined his search, and, it is hoped, the greater his hunger for truth, his love of beauty, his passion for excellence.

My insistence upon the necessity of recruiting the liveliest and most imaginative minds we can in teaching derives from my conviction that we are educated not by courses but by persons. If we have the right sort of persons teaching, it is not likely that they will continue long to teach the trivial and the shallow, or what is even worse, teach only what they have been taught in about the way they have been taught it. A master teacher is somewhat different from a master plumber. He has not only mastered the general technique and content of his profession and specialty, but has retained an inquiring spirit.

It is of course sentimental weakness and intellectual nonsense to declare that one sort of school experience is as good as another. All may be valuable experiences, in some loose sense, but from the viewpoint of what a man needs, not to achieve security but to achieve freedom, all are not equally valuable. The most valuable are not those which give a man the right answers but those which enable a man to ask the right questions, to inquire after truth and virtue with increasing relevance and insight throughout his life. Mottoes will not help him, rituals will not help him, a well-indoctrinated capacity for trivial adjustments to small and large group living will not help him. Unless the content of his education has enabled him to identify himself with the worlds of man — the physical, the moral, the artistic, the religious, the past, the present, the future — he will, though outwardly conforming and outwardly secure, remain isolated within himself, alone and sore afraid, a stranger forever in the casual chaos of an uncomprehended world.

I think we in the schools owe to our youth — and we have always owed it — to join them in honest and open-minded inquiry, to try to understand their concerns, to help them to find honest and relevant answers — above all, to listen to them. A great majority of them have their faces turned toward reality, which is always hard to do in youth because it ages you. But in the face of war, poverty, and mindless injustice, you grow up fast, and sometimes in Vietnamese villages and American ghettos you die young.

In the presence of such realities, to help our boys and girls find honest and relevant answers, must we make our curriculum and teaching problem-centered and present-oriented? I don't think so. I don't think that there is any necessary or logical conjunction between the contemporaneous and the relevant. The insights and intuitions of literature and philosophy, religion, and art have in my own experience been a good deal more relevant to our times and the men we are than a hundred sociological investigations and hypotheses.

On the other hand of course it is possible to take refuge totally in the scholar's study and spend one's intellectual life in suspended judgment, in a kind of introverted anarchism. Non sine pulvere, shouted that great poet, intellectual-activist John Milton. Not without dust, not without sweat. In semi-pedagogy, we have an obligation in the affective domain and in the search for values as heavy as our obligation in the cognitive. Knowledge without the commitment of its use in virtuous action is sterile and ornamental, and often dangerous. It is not enough to know the Bill of Rights, to assent to it with the mind, if there is dissent in the heart. It is not enough to know one's fellow man, to appreciate him, to understand him, or even to cherish him as a fellow-citizen of a democracy. The commandment is to love him as thyself.

Could a generation under the shadow of the bomb, coming to maturity in an affluent economy largely supported by the waste of war, have failed to question the human benefits of scientific progress? If they have been turned off by what they regard as the frivolous disregard of human values in our society and have been turned on by the sentimentality of hard-rock and the cynicism of the theatre of the absurd, this may be nothing more than their way of training for survival in a world they never made.

The activist and the alienated among our youth are prepared to question whether the real world is the "real world" as it is described to them. Why should they, they ask, be turned on by and be prepared to enter into the life of enterprise, productivity, know-how, efficiency, and all the more glittering uses of the mind which our affluent society and rising standard of living are prepared to reward handsomely in all the goods of this world? It isn't just a matter of their being or trying to be more materialistic. I think what they are saying, especially in their rock music but also in their art and in poetry and the theatre, is that neither the fate of the world nor the happiness of the human race can be trusted to cool and high intelligences and a scientific-technological elite.

"Twentieth century America builds schoolhouses with the fervor and at times with the breath-taking imagination with which Europe in the Middle Ages built cathedrals. Possibly we shall never in all our future time build prouder monuments to our hopes and our faith than we shall build in our children's schools."

Books have taught me a lot about man and about me, but very little about schools or how learning or teaching is done. What I know, therefore, about the limitations and powers of schools and colleges in the teaching of values, I know most fully and surely from my own education and my own experience in the practice of it.

... the overwhelming problem is to discover unifying concepts on which to base a definition of our objectives in value-oriented rather than subject-oriented teaching. Having done that, we then face the still harder task of measuring the results of our efforts to attain those objectives. It is fairly clear that so long as we have very muddled ideas about what we are going to become or can become or should become as a society, we shall continue to live existentially in a spinning gyroscopic equilibrium among our divergent beliefs and intentions.

What happens in education in the next twenty years may well happen not because some philosopher or a group of imaginative and forceful educators take leadership and are effective, but because highly sophisticated cyberneticized programs make certain educational processes not only possible but because possible, inevitable. If we are witnessing presently a technological society which is producing anything and everything because it can, it is entirely possible that the same technology in increasingly sophisticated forms will produce educational changes not because they are desirable but because change is a function of the machine and the medium is the message.

The chief internal limitation of teaching . . . is, I think, that most teaching is more concerned with content than with process. It is an unfortunate habit of teachers to confuse education with content and to have coverage of the subject as their goal. One of the most difficult limitations to overcome is that concept which insists that a class is a class is a class, and a teacher is the fellow up front, leading a route march through something called a course.

The real world has intruded spectacularly upon academe. The walls have been breached by the media and the masses. That extraordinary piece of technology which academicians once patronizingly called the "boob" tube has become truly a window on the world for our youth. Never before have so many known so young that war is hell and man can be brutal and poverty destroys bodies and souls, and that in the land of the free, some considerable license is still given for inhumanity to man.

It is fair, I think, to say that the shape that our schools are in is not too different from the shape our culture is in. If American schools belonged less to the people and to the present, and more to the world of scholarship and of the past or the future, they would be a less sensitive and less culpable reflection of our imperfect and culpable society. They would also be less dynamic, less responsible, and in a free society, doubtless less serviceable to the immediate present purposes which a restless, dynamic and slowly maturing culture insists upon for the instrumentalities of its growth.

We have, as a democracy, had a surfeit of self-love and even self-righteousness. To the extent that the schools have felt an obligation to preach a mindlessly conforming citizenship or have been used, or allowed themselves to be used as instruments to blunt the curiosity and disarm the criticisms of the young, they have betrayed a present trust as well as an ancient commitment. Their cardinal sin is not irrelevance, but irreverence, an incapacity to keep the faith. Schools can be and have been corrupted from without and from within by those who have regarded them as expedient tools either for preserving a static or corrupt state or for establishing a new tyranny. This fall from grace cannot be prevented unless the public philosophy in any community and in the nation manifestly sustains the belief that both schools and the state exist for the enrichment of the lives of men and the enlargement of their freedom. If the public philosophy says that the schools exist for the person, then the schools' first moral and political obligation is to turn out not citizens of a democracy as such, but free men, that is, men who love freedom and know how to love it, to use it as well as to preserve it, to enjoy it as well as defend it.

Possibly our country is still not old enough to accord culture an easy respect or to hail learning with universal consent as the whole or even the chief excuse for schools. Pragmatic America has crowned science king and elected technology prime minister, but perhaps the humanities, like the saints, will soon come marching in, with music and the fine arts. Before this can happen, however, the American people must indicate that the political and social aims which they have for their schools are not ends but only means. We must be willing to agree that the end of education is not the production merely of politically-minded, socially-minded, economically-minded men, or production-or consumption-minded men. We must persuade ourselves that our business is not alone biological or economic survival or political or social aggrandisement. We are not here merely to subsist, or to run our economic system, or our government, but someday to enjoy the life of man. A time will come when we can put aside childish things, our gadgets and our fearful toys, and begin to cultivate our own gardens and ourselves, serve higher causes, and dream bolder dreams. This is to say that the education of man must have the sanction and force of a true faith. This faith, as it has been taught by the great teachers of the world, holds that man is spirit and that to be man it is necessary to live in spirit. The vocation of humanity requires the exercise of mind and the nurture of soul. We in the schools shall certainly have many compromises to make with the appetites and the flesh, but we are obligated to know that they are compromises and to hold clearly in our minds and in the public mind the prior tasks and purposes of schools. It is only by such clarifying of public and professional educational philosophy and practice that we can aspire to that "habitual vision of greatness" which Whitehead so eloquently defined as the aim of education.

Space flight itself has been only a technological problem and a mechanical adventure compared with the reach of man's mind, the almost limitless scope for his imagination not in science alone but in all creations of beauty. We cannot stifle our children by our own narrowness, by our fears and tensions, by our yearning for security and our demand of it for them. Security, we must know, we cannot give them, with all our wealth. We can only bequeath them some of our own faith and hope; we can educate them as if they and men of kindred spirit all over the world were going to inherit the earth. And perhaps if men are meek enough, unambitious for security but thirsty for wisdom and beauty, perhaps if they understand better than we of this generation have, how to live as men, they will inherit our more fully civilized descendants and heirs this once and future Eden.

I think most of us realize that what happens in a school depends very much upon the climate of learning created there by the teachers and scholars. If it is not a climate of inquiry, of seeking not merely to be informed, but to comprehend, then true education is not taking place. Teachers I have held as my models, and the teacher I thought I was when I was teaching, are those who have contributed such climates in their classrooms, and have contributed to the larger climate of learning in the school itself.

What does a good teacher do in a classroom? What are his habits of relating himself to his subject, himself to his students, and cultivating their understanding of both? I have long held a theory that ultimately a teacher teaches only himself, only what he is as a person. A subject becomes understandable and, if possible, fascinating only insofar as he as a person is able through patience, zeal, kindness, and clarity to communicate it to his students. Ultimately, we are not educated by courses, or books, or devices, or curricula, but by persons, living and dead, who have been most effective in communicating — often eloquently, sometimes with elegant detachment — but always clearly, humanly, and personally, about what they know, feel, believe, or have experienced or observed.

In the current game of semantic scrabble in which our shifty educational dialecticians are engaged, one of the high premium scoring words is "accountability." Almost everyone I have read on the subject thinks it is a good idea. No one I have read on the subject knows how it is done except in the most simplistic ways — in performance contracting, or by head-count of National Merit Scholarships semi-finalists. The reason for our difficulty in defining accountability in education is not far to seek. Unlike complex industrial empires like General Motors and U.S. Steel, the vast educational enterprise in the United States is incomparably more diversified in resources, management, and operations. It is totally different in its products, if they can be called such; they cannot be tested except by their ensuing lifetimes, and their education can be evaluated only in a very long term. The test of what schools accomplish is always delayed and residual. It cannot be said too often that education is a process and not a product, and that schools are a part of the process. The test of their effectiveness is: Does that process continue after the students depart from the schools? Does the mind continue to inquire? Is there a lifelong search for values and commitments? We cannot ask what is the product of the schools, but what do the products produce?

I suppose many of you know of my admiration for John Locke. I have quoted, before, a thought of his which I find at the heart of what I hope will continue to be the spirit of New Trier because it speaks to the personal involvement of the teacher, and the warmth and sympathetic understanding every teacher must have if he is to be a teacher at all. Locke wrote:

Children are travelers newly-arrived in a strange country of which they know nothing. We should, therefore, make conscience not to mislead them. They are strangers to all we are acquainted with, and all things they meet with are at first unknown to them as they once were to us, and happy are they who meet with civil people that will comply with their ignorance and help them get out of it.

With civility toward ignorance and with sensitivity to feelings, schools, and New Trier especially, must, above all, be about the business of nurturing intelligence and persons in order that men thus well-nurtured may build an increasingly human society in order, in turn, that increasingly sensitive, reasonable men may have the freedom and scope and mutual challenge further to create, and in creating to rejoice and honor the beauty and power of Man's mind.

The Cornogs, a few years ago.

A Tribute

Thirty-one years ago William Hafner Cornog made a choice and a commitment: he left what might have been a brilliant career as a university professor to work for quality education in high schools. Nineteen of those years Dr. Cornog has served the New Trier High Schools as superintendent.

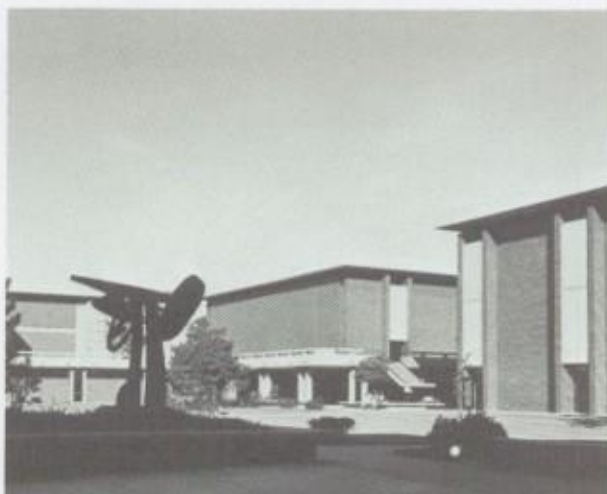

His years here have been marked with building programs. He arrived when the new Tower Building was being constructed at East and leaves as the Old Gym is being replaced there. Mid-career, Dr. Cornog guided the referendums, planning, building, and staffing of the township's second high school, New Trier West.

When, at the dedication of New Trier West in May, 1967, John W. Gardner, then secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, spoke of New Trier as "an uncompromising commitment to excellence," he described the superintendent as well. Few men have been more committed to learning and to teaching than William H. Cornog. His speeches resound with oft-repeated phrases, which characterize his thinking: "the mind of man," "the humanity of man," "human dignity," "open-minded inquiry," "self-discipline," "moral and spiritual values," "a free society," "free man," "a lifetime of learning."

Ever alert to world changes — political, economic, scientific, social — and their effects on personal lives, he still sees education as the most important factor in man's life. While he recognizes that his own classical education is not right for every student, he holds rather closely to a statement written in 1958 to his faculty: "our primary concern at New Trier is with the fullest development of the person Every student must be challenged and held to as high a standard of work as his will to learn and his natural endowment and the inspiration and the patience of his teachers will allow."

Dr. Cornog has stood tall for teachers and teaching. He wrote to the New Trier faculty once ". . . to repose the utmost confidence in the integrity and authority of every teacher is to place upon each a very heavy burden of responsibility. This I do cheerfully, and without compunction, because I cannot administer a school in any other way." This faith in teachers has prompted him to approve experimentation in the classroom including the open school approach of the Learning Center at East and the consideration of a similar experiment at West, the Humanities Program for juniors at West, and the teaching of philosophy in both schools.

William H. Cornog's creed for both students and teachers is best summed up in the words engraved on the dedication plaque of New Trier West: "Our purpose is to commit minds to inquiry, hearts to compassion, and lives to the service of mankind."

Non Class Time

The Non-Class Time Committee is the largest, most active organization at NTW. Our purpose is to give the school a more relaxed atmosphere by offering an assortment of speakers and events throughout the school day. The interest our committee spurs is not just reflected by the size of our group, but our strength lies in the interest students show everytime they attend events we sponsor. There's plenty of opportunity for involvement in Non-Class-Time; that's why its the greatest!

NTW Guard

NTW Guard is an organization which offers not only a challenge, but satisfaction and enjoyment as well, to each of its members. We service the community by providing swimming lessons on Saturday mornings and it's well worth facing the awful showers and splashes to have the experience of working with children. A treasure hunt and the homecoming float, in addition to other activities make NTW Guard membership rewarding.

NTW News

The news room is a nice place to visit and, if one can judge by the great amount of time spent there by both staff members and other students, a nice place to live. Of course, who can blame a person for wishing to surround himself by such a stimulating environment?

The staff has weathered many attacks this year, including numerous threats and even an anonymous letter of complaint sent to one columnist's parents. However, in its never-ending fight for freedom of the press, the NT-W News pledges to continue its tradition as the finest newspaper at New Trier West.

WNTH is an incredible opportunity which many students overlook. It's a place to obtain radio experience and many WNTH people have gone into professional radio. Soundtracks

Social Service is an organization which involves NTW students with lending a hand to others within their community as well as outside the community. Gourmet Club

Gourmet Club is a group of chefs who meet every other Monday after school to concoct "gourmet food." At each session two students lecture on and prepare a special dish. The best part of Gourmet Club is eating!

TAD

Teens Against Dystrophy (TAD) is a group of students working together in an effort to fight muscular dystrophy. From parties for dystrophic children to the fund-raising telethon in September, TAD members have a fantastic time while receiving the satisfaction and warm feeling of helping others.

Chess Club

Chess Club offers a variety of intellectual strategy, humorous conversation, and an in-depth look at snakes. The meetings are primarily a training ground for our afternoon and overnight tournaments.

N-Club

Because sports are such an important part of NTW, N-Club has been renewed as an organization for varsity lettermen. N-Club provides its members with a chance to get together and share common interests.

International Club

International Club (ICC) is a group of students who are interested in the cultural activities of other people. We are mainly language oriented, although one need not be currently taking a language. Our activities have included doing some Spanish tutoring, visiting restaurants and institutes, receiving speakers and invited guests and holding a banquet at the close of the year.

Amateur Radio Club

Amateur Radio Club is important because it gives its members a chance to talk to people all over the world. Not many organizations can boast that!

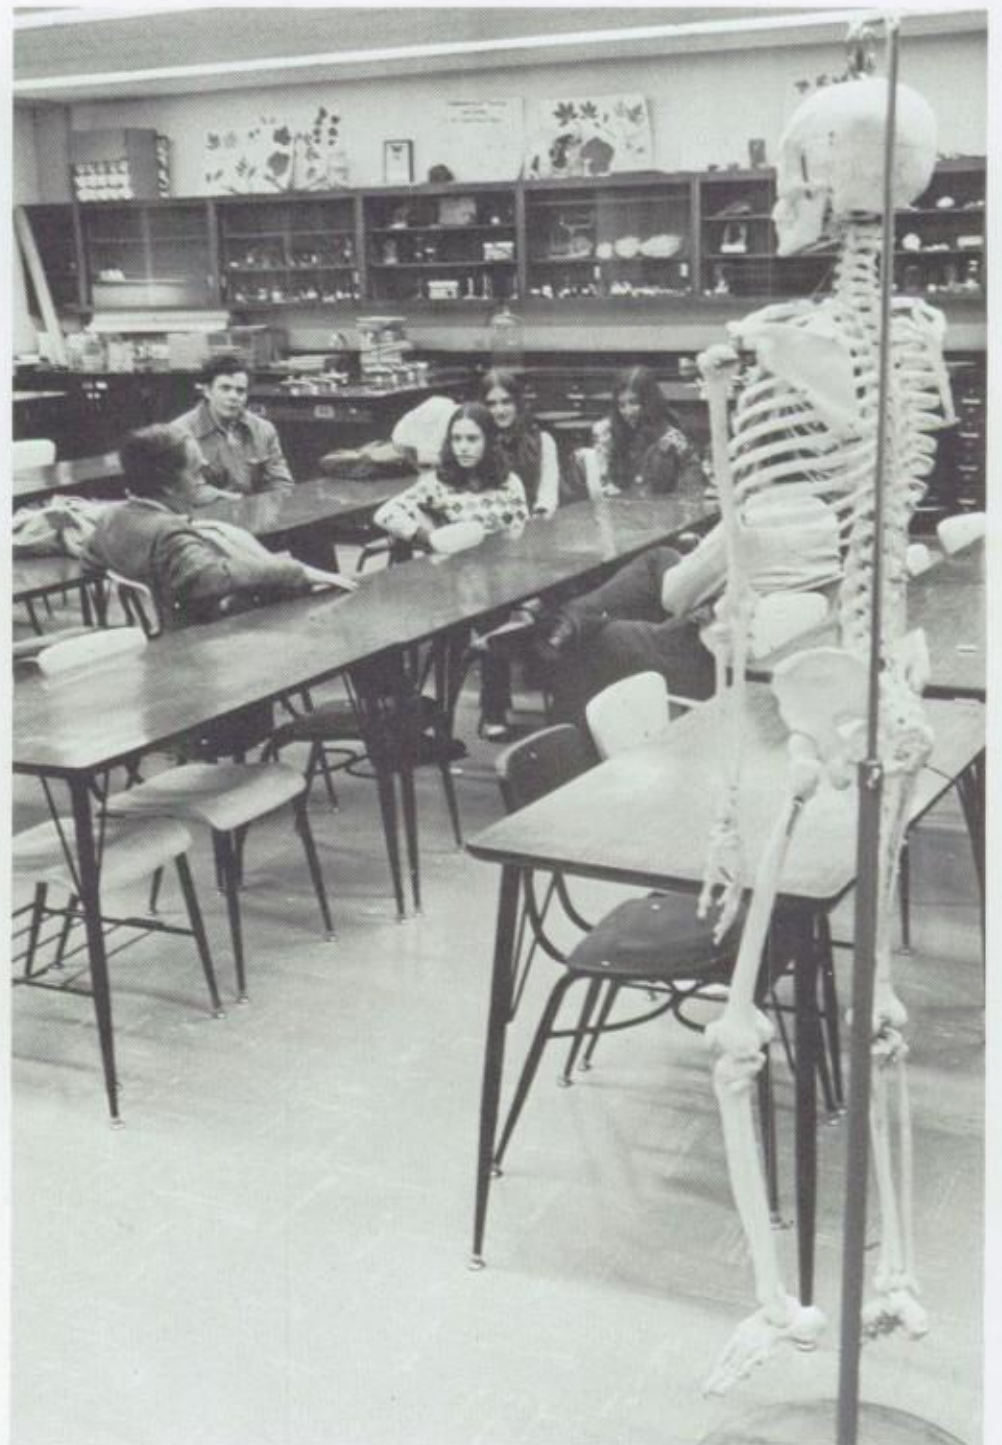

Rocketeers

Rocketeers offers students a pint size view into inter-galactic transportation and design. At Rocketeers, members can shoot off their rockets as well as their mouths.

Aesculapians

The Aesculapian Club gives students who are interested in medicine a chance to learn about the many opportunities available in the medical field. The club has speakers and field trips which encourage its members to pursue their medical interest and to broaden their knowledge.

Our lives keep changing
The World is moving
We're rearranging
We're still improving
We know that trends will be always taking place
Mutability
Marks the human race
We're changing our ways
To fit every craze.

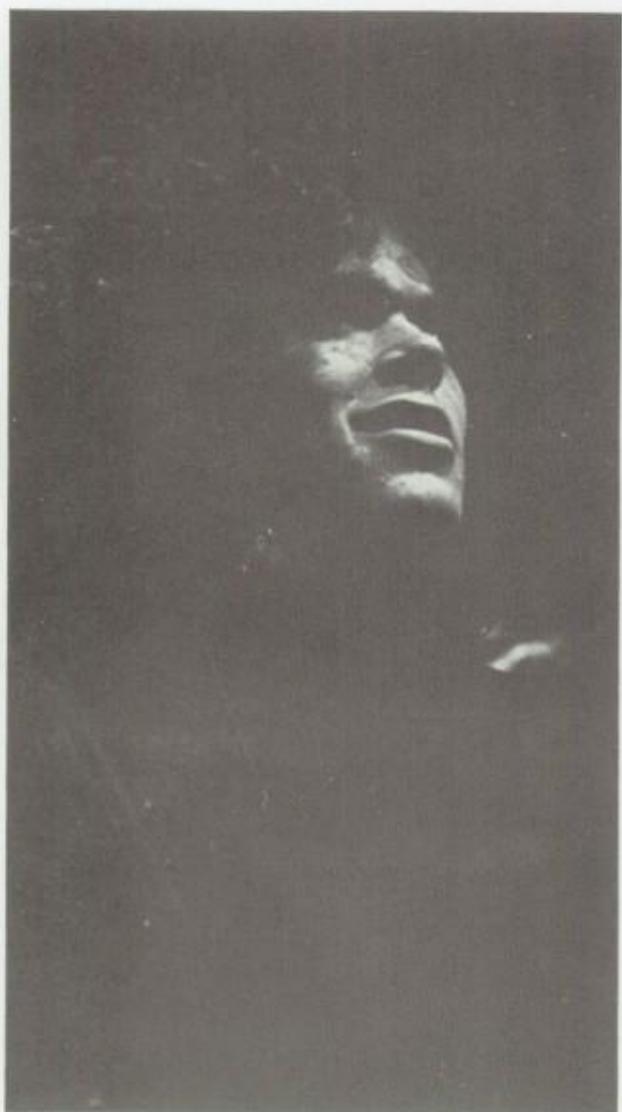

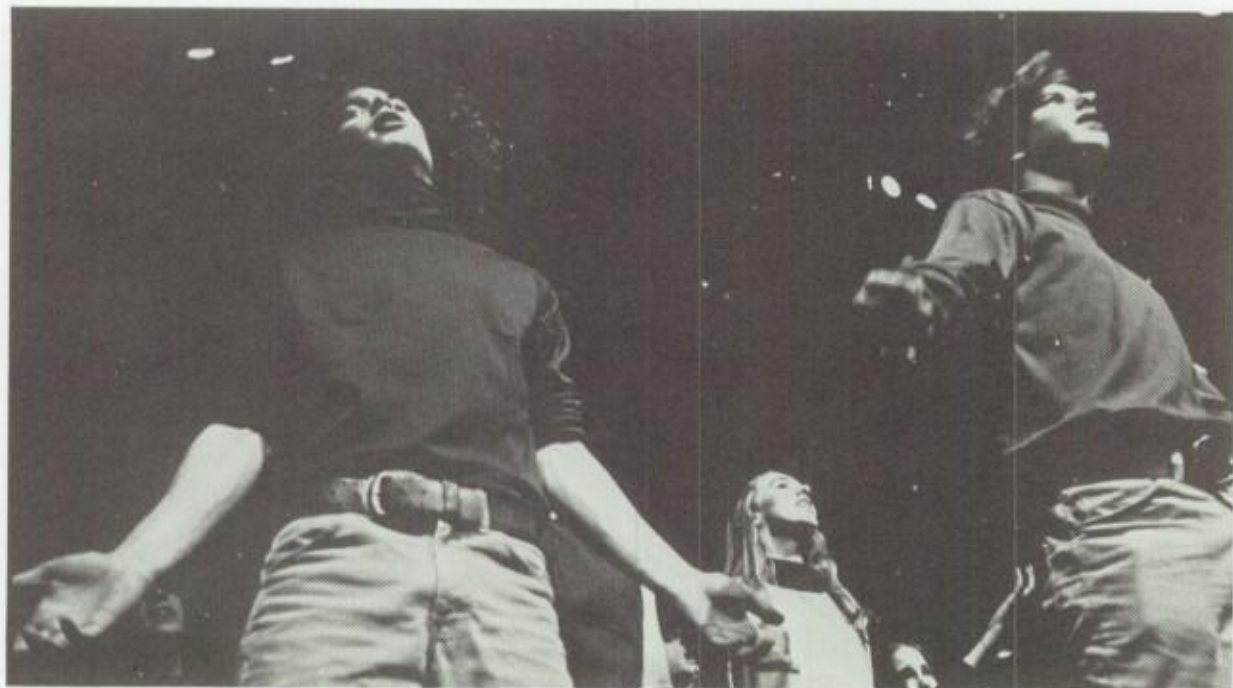

Travel's increasing
Hijacking's decreasing
Urban renewal
Needs a reviewal
With Unions striking
And kids hitch-hiking
The new wife swapping
Has churches hopping ablaze
With every new craze.

Dorms now are co-ed
Ralph Nader has said
That Ford must be sued
And projects reviewed
Red lipstick is back
Today's zodiac
Says marriage is wise
We all analyze
While we're in a daze
From every new craze.

New trends keep appearing
And New Trends are adhering
They keep the world changing
They keep us rearranging
Our ways

Oklahoma

"Oklahoma,
Where the wind comes sweepin' down the plain,
And the wavin' wheat
Can sure smell sweet
When the wind comes right behind the rain.
Oklahoma,
Every night my honey lamb and I
Sit alone and talk
And watch a hawk
Makin' lazy circles in the sky.
We know we belong to the land
And the land we belong to is grand!
And when we say!
Yeow! A-yip-i-o-ee-ay!
We're only sayin'
You're doin' fine, Oklahoma!
Oklahoma, O.K.!"

Fantasticks

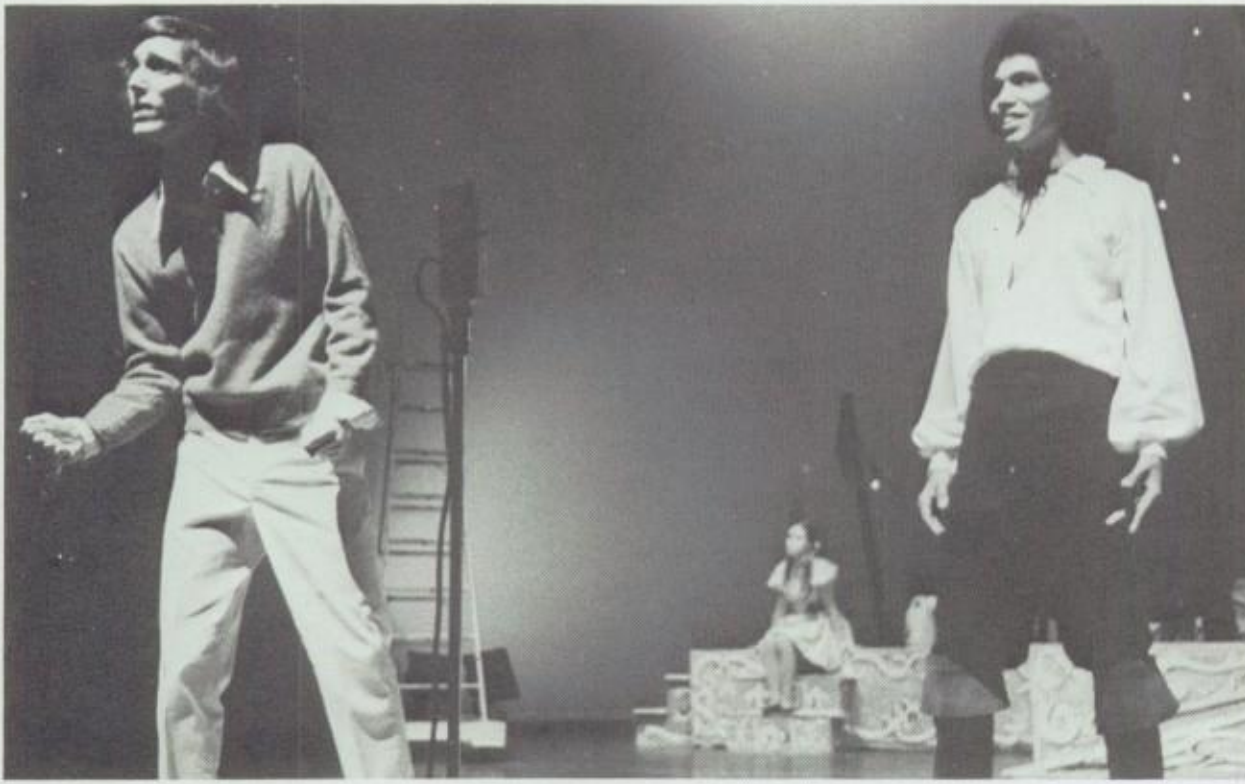

"There is a curious paradox
That no one can explain.
Who understands the secret
Of the reaping of the grain?

Who understands why Spring is born
Out of Winter's laboring pain?
Or why we all must die a bit
Before we grow again.

I do not know the answer.
I merely know it's true.
I hurt them for that reason
And myself a little bit too.
(HE steps back into the shadows)"

Invisible Dragon

Rambunctiousness, refinement, absurdity and philosophy are the elements of the traveling children's play, "The Magic Dragon." The student cast brings its young audience the message that to be happy yourself, you must help others. The play is bound together by sparks of music, slapstick and magic.

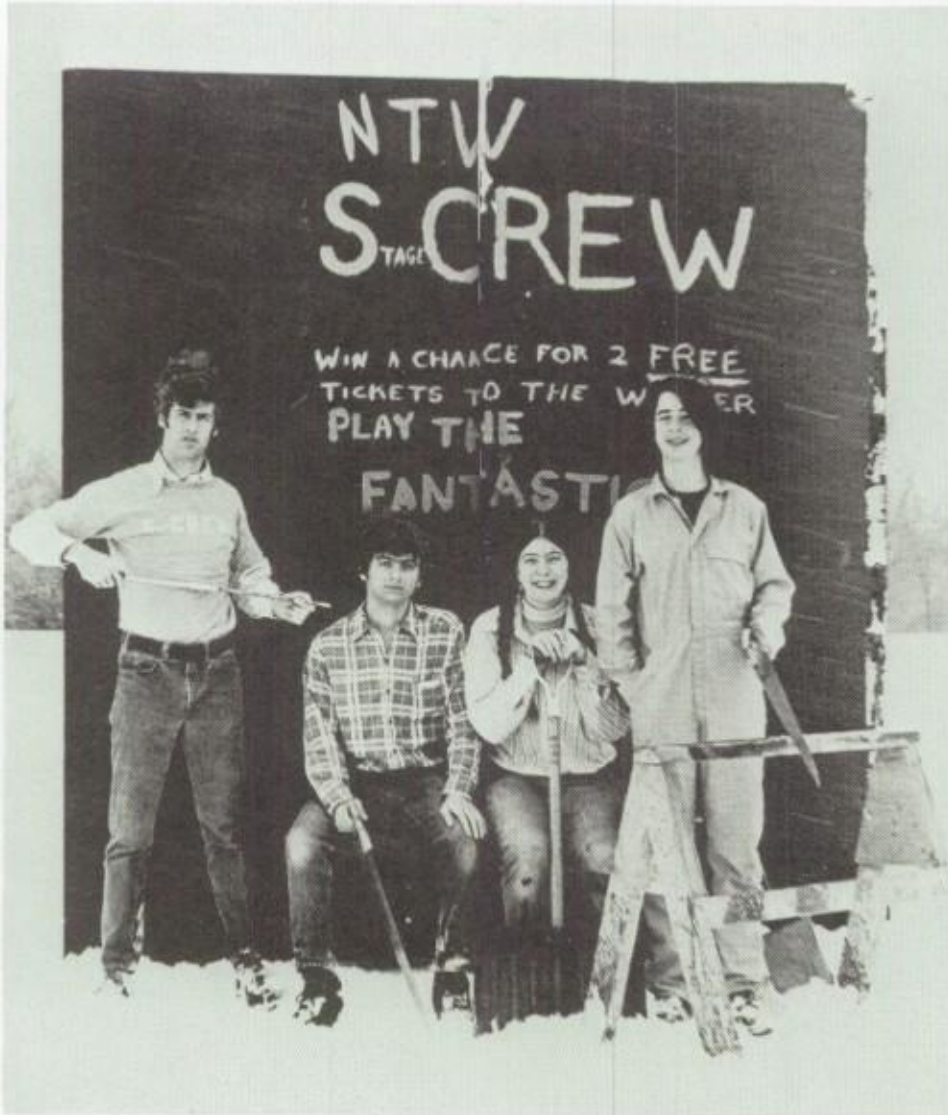

Studio Theatre

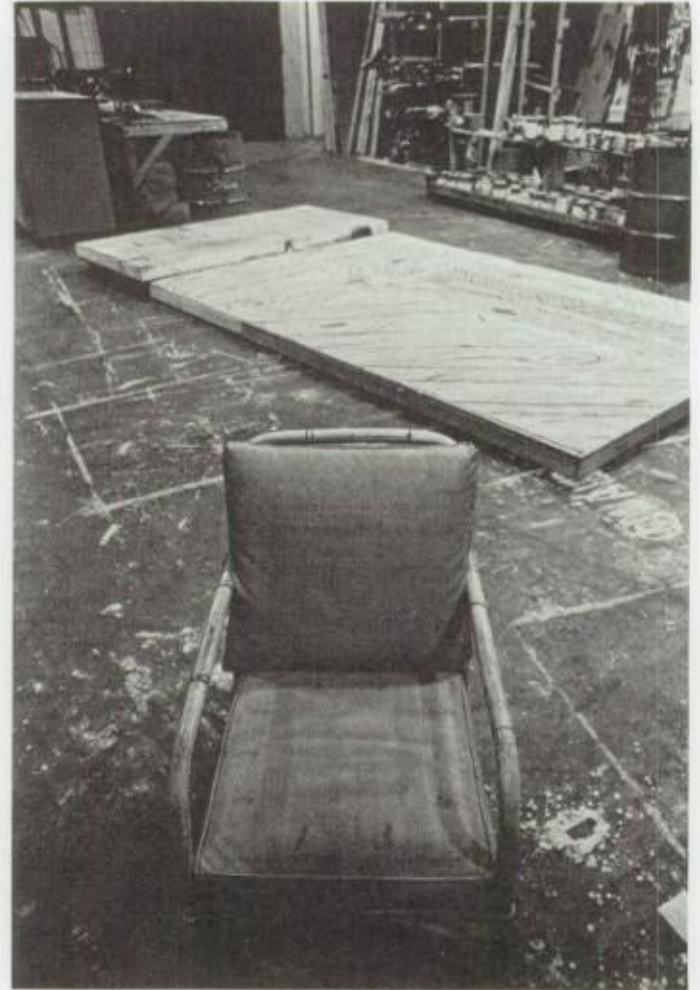

Studio Theatre is a series of three one-act plays along with selected scenes from the Rep. Theatre Class. It is designed to give acting experience to underclassmen. The theatre-in-the round provides a feeling of intimacy with the audience while the small cast creates a sense of unity. Overall, the experience is one of hard work and accomplishment.

Stage Crew

Absent: Mr. Riggs, sponsor.

Stage Crew is an opportunity to learn skills such as set lighting, set construction and painting. But most important is the sense of cooperation and unity we learn by starving, flunking and working together with a common goal in mind — doing a show well.

Football

The team got off to a rough start this year, but we picked up as the season progressed. Hard work prevailed and payed off as we finished the best 3-5 team in the state!

Football takes skill, self-discipline and lots of practice. And speaking of practice, who could forget those glorious double practices (in full pads) in 95 degree heat and 95 percent humidity?! Overall we had a respectable season — we can't expect to be League Champs every year!

Soccer

This year's team started out as a group of individuals trying to play soccer. As the season progressed, somehow the group of individuals turned into a team. With each win, loss, and tie we grew in strength — not just in soccer prowess, but in team unity and character.

Even though it's easy to be unhappy about the final outcome of our season, one finds it hard not to smile at the memories of Cranbrook, Detroit Country Day, and all the sweatsuits we stole. In the immortal words of Sander Yabo, "if you can't win a state championship — steal it!"

Cross Country is a sport for the most dedicated and self-disciplined athletes. This sport provides a temporary sanctuary from the boredom of winning on a track; it offers competition on an individual and team level. The satisfaction that comes from success in cross country cannot be expressed with words.

Basketball

Tension, repetition, and constant practice compose the most difficult aspects of basketball. A Basketball team does not have one star, but draws on the entire group for a good season. It's really great to feel a crowd's enthusiastic support, right down to the popcorn and paper airplanes.

Fencing has changed its form over the years from gladiators, to cavalry, to dueling, to the present day three-weapon competitions (foil, épée, and saber) used at the college, club and Olympic levels. During the past four years, the NTW Fencing Team has ranked high in various local and state tournaments. Because of the great Frosh and Soph teams, NTW Fencing will continue to uphold its fine reputation.

Golf

Golf may only seem like a foursome of deranged doctors seeking relaxation while slashing little white spheres into oblivion, but it is more than that. It requires a combination of precise skill, deep mental concentration and a bit of luck. Although one must pay to practice and play at NTW, the enjoyment and satisfaction is worth more than the fee.

"Human history becomes more and more a race between education and catastrophe."
— Herbert George Wells

What can the educator say to the Watergate generation, to those disillusioned with all authority because of the abuse of some in authority? What role can reason and emotion — exemplified in the arts, the sciences, and the humanities — possibly have in an irrational and callous age?

Those New Trier graduates who would believe that they are departing like automobiles off an assembly line of that free public institution, the high school, into the real world are deluded. These four years are years of faith, and that faith is the reality which confronts perpetual sham. If we teachers have not granted our students the chance to discover a faith in reason which can detect and affect catastrophe before it occurs, then we are no better than any abuser of public trust. If we have not encouraged our students to have faith in compassion, then we are part of the catastrophe. Since every age is indecipherable to those who live within it, all we teachers can wish you now is best wishes and the best of faith.

New Trier is as much a condition of the spirit as it is a geographic place. It is not merely a school; it is a way of life, a philosophy, a collection of aspirations. It is a learning place without teachers because everyone is a student. New Trier is long days, late hours, weekends of work, crowded months, exhausting years that all pass in an instant. New Trier is a pilgrim's place where the future is more important than the past and where hope is more than promise. It is where dreams become reality and reality becomes dreams.

Seniors

It's like being on top of the world;
no one dares to go as high.
It's finding out that the world doesn't necessarily wait for hesitant footsteps or self-imposed ignorance.
It's been one hell of a camp!
Is there really life after senior year?
Wondering, is there life after the acne stage?
We will never know such confidence, such security, such idle fun again.

Juniors

Man knows not when he is dead, only dying. No fear has he of death, only dying. A school, with its beginning and its middle and its end, is in itself a life. Three quarters of our life is spent, gone forever like our grammar school innocence and the unused courses that might have ended this existence and started another. Three years gone without learning the difference between three years wasted and three years. We fear not starting the new life, but ending the present one.

Sophomores

Being a sophomore is a great advantage, at least over being a freshman; there are less frustrations and more privileges. Sure, there's one class below us, but there are still two above us (bless their hearts!).

Sophomores are paranoid and with good reason. Everybody, but everybody is out to get us — teachers, administrators, juniors, seniors, parents, policemen, politicians, movie theatre owners, and dog catchers. We're too young to drink, too young to drive, and too young to do anything good, but old enough to know not to do anything bad.

Freshmen

Freshman year is a time of change: a change of schools, a change of friends, and a change of values. This experience calls for exchanging the security of a familiar junior high for the confusion of NTW's halls with its unfamiliar faces. Being a freshman can be exciting, frustrating, or just unavoidable. To some, NTW seems large and impersonal, while for others it offers the opportunity to make new friends and to participate in new activities. Freshman year is a time of change and a time of growing.
